Poetry Corner
It Is Not Dusk, Nor A Death Of Dreams
by Churaumanie Bisundyal “Dedicated to the late Cheffdi B. Jagan, past president of Guyana”

The horizon is in fire of tears;
Yet it is not dusk,
or a death of dreams,
neither the end of colours that have come from the perennial flow
of your love.
It is only another beginning, today’s sun rising
to paint new horizons
with your passion,
to caress stronger waves to roll and break on the shores of your beliefs
to pervade every coast,
every island,
every ocean.

Then, O great one,
it is not dusk,
or a death of dreams,
neither a surrender to
weeping,
for it is a beautiful
dawn again,
your voice whispering
in the wind.
you, the silent one,
watching me
writing the cadence
of your joy,
the creeping waves
of the ocean
singing sweetly
that you’ll never die.
The flowers are in mourning
and the leaves
bend their heads in sorrow, but the bees of your spirit hover like dancing nymphs in the fresh air,
transporting nectar
to sweeten the hearts of nations,
the hives of your
vision dripping,
overfilled,
with the juice of peace,
warning men must drop their swords
and listen to the sermon of the flower.

Then my pen is singing
that you’ll never die.
This is not dusk,
neither is it the death of dreams.
The dark clouds of sorrow are fast moving away and your bright face
is shining in the blue sky.
Everywhere darlings
of your love
are weeping,
as you sit quietly
with your memory,
thinking of your dark days,
of your strength and craft to prune thorns
into bearing trees,
of your patience
to urge the udders
of hard rocks
to yield the milk
of understanding.
It is not dusk,
or a time of weeping.
For your spirit is moving fast
like the current
of the ocean
pulling the rivers together, washing over reefs
and islands
of shallow prejudices, adorning the altar of reason with garlands of peaceful living.

Why should my pen weep,
O great one,
For death is only a seed to fall on the ground and regenerate
with brighter luxuriance, larger branches
and greener leaves,
your eyes
now in the fragrance
of a million flowers,
your voice,
in the flavour
of lascious fruits
hanging in bunches
of profusion
for the human mind to pick and eat.

It is not dusk,
O great one,
neither a death of dreams,
for you are now living a thousand times stronger in the affection
of every thought,
embraced as the legend
of our conscience,
becoming the confluence of our vow
to live as a better nation in a great merging where there can be no resistance to love.

(Churaumanie Bisundyal is a
noted author,
journalist, playwright
and poet from Guyana, who has lived and
written in New York.
Bisundyal
is the first Guyanese writer to win the prestigious American award for creative artists—The Fulbright Residency Award. At YADD, he is editor of “Sky Dance,” an anthology of poems by Guyanese Indian writers.)